Health Services of the Future

The former Surgeon General of the Public Health Service, Leroy E. Burney, M.D., in addressing the 14th National Dental Health Conference, projected ten methods for meeting the health needs of the public. His predictions are: (1) the health professions will come to recognize that they are social sciences and as such will be affected more and more by the dynamic economic, social and political factors in society; (2) health care will become more and more a basic right, not just a privilege; (3) comprehensive health care, preventive, curative and restorative, will be the objective of the professions, and, of these, the greatest emphasis will be on prevention; (4) progress in health care creates increasing demand and utilization—these result in changing patterns of care and higher costs; (5) governmental influence—local, state and federal—through increased responsibility in reimbursement for care, will result in more controls related to quality, availability, comprehensiveness, cost and financial accountability; (6) physician and dental manpower shortages will continue, requiring increased production and utilization of auxiliary health personnel; (7) patterns of care and the demand to narrow the yawning gap between knowledge and its application will require adding new disciplines to the health team and greater interdependence of action in providing total care; (8) hospitals will become the major focus for health services, the real community health center; (9) specialization will become even more a dominant characteristic of dental and medical practice; (10) schools of dentistry and medicine will assume, rightfully, greater, and hopefully, more imaginative responsibility for continuing education.
